Introduction

This cumulative index was prepared so that readers might have easier access to the contents of the International Journal of Comparative And Applied Criminal Justice. The 23 volumes edited by Professor Dae H. Chang, Editor-in-Chief, contain 496 articles.

One of the perennial complaints about criminal justice research, and about all social science research for that matter, is that it does not cumulate enough. Cumulation is essential if criminal justice research is to mature and develop a more sound theoretical base. Too often current studies do not build on earlier work on the same topic. As a result, the words "groundbreaking," "new," and "exploratory" are used when nothing could be further from the truth.

Research would be easier, richer, and more useful if scholars and practitioners were able to "stand on the [proverbial] shoulders of their predecessors." Cumulation can enhance utilization of research as the weight of evidence on a topic accumulates. An index is an aid for those who would review the literature and a better starting point than either ignoring the past or relying on serendipity to identify appropriate materials. Unfortunately, existing indexes usually focus on a few recent years rather than index journals in their entirety, and usually assign a very limited number of subject headings to each article. To assign a single subject heading to an article, as some indexes do, may identify a topic or the major focus of an article while ignoring other topics and subtopics. This index contains from 4 to 20 subject headings per article.

The format of entries in this index are illustrated in the following subject entry:

acquaintance rape 17, 2: 229-242.

subject: acquaintance rape
volume: 17
issue: 2
pages: 229-242

Author entries include a complete bibliographic entry under the first author's name. Second and other authors are included in the author index. Content of second author entries is limited to a reference to the primary entry under the first author's name.
